This may change things by making more software like Google Earth available, perhaps creating the kinds of things that might have been produced by Viewmaster or Google's other predecessors. ~~~ roc The issue isn't a lack of software, it's that the software being written today is so top-down and context-specific. That's not going to change as the author argues. That said, I'd like to know more about the Windows version of this tool. Google's current efforts on desktop are all very 'web-oriented' and don't seem to contain any real commitment to real-time, interactive GIS stuff. As an example, when I'm walking in the woods and see a building in satellite view, it's relatively easy to figure out how to get to it. There's an obvious road, and you can see the buildings in the satellite view at the top. So I can, say, teleport to the top of the building. But in Google Earth, you only see the building in satellite view as you zoom in. There's no top-down, real-time view. And this is in a project where I'm working on making it easy to build a map- based application that runs on Windows. ~~~ makecheck The web version of the app is really a demonstration of the potential. If you just want to "get to" the building, just

use the Maps browser
